Gianna’s Trench Coat for Colder Days

Emile Al-Billeh

Analysis

- Needs (Functional):
  - Sleek while commuting and moving through tight spaces.
  - Tote-bag compatibility: minimal shoulder bulk + stable strap behavior.
  - Light or breathable feel for constant indoor/outdoor transitions. (She'll trade some warmth to avoid heaviness)
  - Structured silhouette that looks put-together and doesn't slip off shoulders.
  - Gloves solution: she forgets them. Always-available gloves can be useful.
  - Owns a trench coat for light cold days, and puffer for colder days but hates wearing puffer because it feels like having too much on. Missing a trench style coat that is effective for the colder days.
  - Zippers for practicality + better seal for warmth, but favorite aesthetic is still buttons
- Wants (Aesthetic/Identity):
  - "Minimalist + classy," neutral palette (navy/black/dark red), clean lines, nothing loud.
  - Versatility: one coat that works across work, school, family, all-encompassing.
- Aspirations (Emotional):
  - Wants to feel warm + composed without feeling "dragged down" or "wearing too much."
  - She's intentional, avoids clutter/trends, and keeps pieces longer. So the ideal coat is a "quiet investment."

Light fur around convertible collar (Maintains clean look when lying flat, and optimal warmth around neck when stood up)

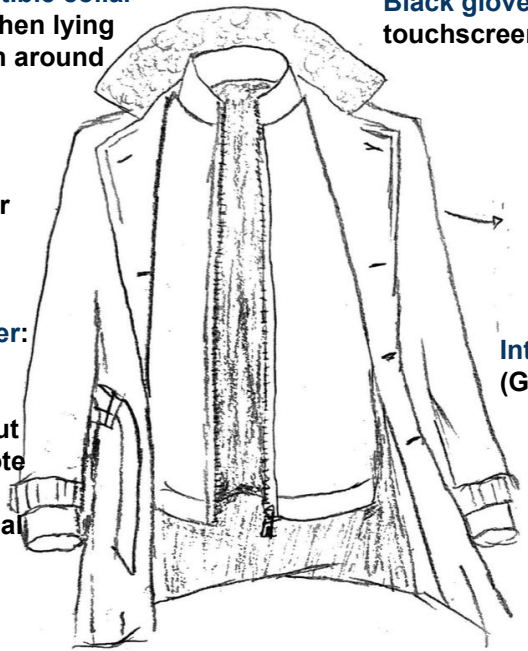
Black gloves, thin, and touchscreen-capable

Low bulk shoulders (Tote never slips)

Hidden back micro vents (No one sees them but she feels the difference)

A. Outer shell: Navy (or deep black), wool, water resistant, can be spot cleaned

B. Invisible warmth liner: A thin, removable insulated liner (Warmth gain without puffer volume, so tote and mobility stay unchanged), charcoal black, machine washable



Interior gloves pocket (Gloves included)

Back vertical slit (For mobility and comfortable seating in tight places like subway)

Two hip pockets

Self-fabric belt to control tightness around the waist and create sleek composed look even on coldest days

Coldest days look:

- Inner layer zips up for practicality and to seal maximum warmth
- Outer layer has buttons for classy aesthetic
